COMMENTS FROM THE PORTFOLIO MANAGER

Groundhog days can turn to months. After a roaring start, 2021 ends where it started. The interest rate and inflation scare has won the narrative, for now, keeping a lid on the Great Acceleration that started in 2020. This year, Fed fears hit us repeatedly, in March, Sept, and again in Dec. This last month in particular, growth stocks gyrated wildly. The Omicron wave which started on Thanksgiving has gone global at light speed. Everyone's catching it, but it's not helping Innovation stocks like prior waves did. Perversely, it's too weak a variant to stimulate digital life any further, while nasty enough to delay supply chain normalization and push finished goods prices even higher. The optimists point to an ideal scenario for herd immunity and full reopening in the Spring. But the wait might just feel eternal. The Fed is itching to hike. The March 2021 playbook is back on the table, with US 10-year bonds heading to 2%, and probably higher, taking G7 yields up with them. Our tech deflation thesis is pushed out.

In 2021, major indexes showed good performance, but the concentration in mega caps is higher than ever. Seven companies—Apple, Microsoft, Tesla, Amazon, Alphabet, Nvidia and Meta (Facebook)—add up to nearly 50% of the Nasdaq 100 Index, as of year-end 2021. Meanwhile, nearly 40% of Nasdaq Composite stocks are down 50% or more. For us, focused as we are on emerging technology mid-caps, this index concentration was a challenge, and we end the year up a meager +1.77%. We think index concentration should reverse with Quantitative Tightening in 2022. Looking at performance, December gave us some modest gains with Spanish EV home charger co. Wallbox; Dutch smart grid software co. Alfen; Semiconductor etching leader Lam Research; together with Apple and Meta helping us play defense. On the challenging side, we saw a pullback in solar inverter co. Enphase Energy as the supply chains are pressuring margins; a sell-off in German meal kit leader HelloFresh also due also to a margin squeeze; hydrogen powerhouse Plug Power had another bout of volatility, and the vaccine duo BioNTech and Moderna retreated from their November Omicron spike.

Despite the macro mess, Disruption Fund has identified 5 majors investment themes for 2022: The Semiconductor arms race; Clean Tech and energy decarbonization; Metaverse and the avatar consumer; Fintech and the crypto paradigm shift; Cybersecurity; Biotech and personalized medicine. These themes are at their tipping points in both public awareness and policy priority. They dominate our January portfolio.
